The Banks of Paris

One of the few drawbacks of running a site such as DDC is that there are never enough hours in the day, something has to give and usually it is my good intention to post a piece.
OK I am going to plough through the archives in the next few weeks to try and clear out the backlog............we’ll see how long this impulse last is what I hear you say. Let’s make a start.............
Montlhéry to the South-West of Paris is these days a place to look back at the rich history of the car. Various events are organised through the year, mainly with a very French taste, all the better for that rich cuisine.
So in late September there will be the fourth edition of Les Grandes Heures Automobile, currently a secret except those truly in the know. However I would suggest that a visit would be most enjoyable for those who enjoy all aspects of motoring, particularly involving competition.
Those of you with an adventurous spirit should give it a go.............these fabulous images from 2016 shown the rich menu on offer for the automotive gourmet.

Information etc can be found here
